Specialist in digital geopolitics, Ophélie Coelho is an independent researcher and member of the scientific council of the Rousseau Institute. Currently in charge of user studies at the interministerial digital department, she has worked in the digital industry since 2009, first as a front-end developer and product manager within companies, start-ups and communities.

Her field of research questions in particular the stakes of technological dependencies in the geopolitical context. As such, she studies the balance of power between digital players, and the consequences of the oligopolies formed today by Big Techs.
